Our first scripture reading, Genesis 21:8-20, is one of many stories in scripture about a father and two sons. In this narrative, we witness the painful reality of the unchosen ones in the biblical narrative. The joy and gift of Isaac's birth to Sarah led to the oppression for Ishmael and Hagar who were banished into the wilderness. There is great irony in this story. The oppressors are Sarah and Abraham, God's people, and those in need of God's liberating power are Egyptians: Hagar, and Ishmael. In the Book of Exodus, we know the story of oppression, only the roles are reversed. This ironic twist underscores how oppression is inherent to humanity rather than specific classes, races, or nationalities. The story also reveals the character of Yahweh who "hears the voice of the boy" and responds lovingly. The "other son" is not dismissed from the family of God. Like a mother who will not forsake her nursing child and like a father who runs to welcome the prodigal home, God is faithful (even when the people of God would disagree).

8 The child grew and was weaned; and Abraham made a great feast on the day that Isaac was weaned. 9 But Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, whom she had borne to Abraham, playing with her son Isaac. 10 So she said to Abraham, "Cast out this slave woman with her son; for the son of this slave woman shall not inherit along with my son Isaac." 11 The matter was very distressing to Abraham on account of his son. 12 But God said to Abraham, "Do not be distressed because of the boy and because of your slave woman; whatever Sarah says to you, do as she tells you, for it is through Isaac that offspring shall be named for you. 13 As for the son of the slave woman, I will make a nation of him also, because he is your offspring." 14 So Abraham rose early in the morning, and took bread and a skin of water, and gave it to Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, along with the child, and sent her away. And she departed and wandered about in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. 15 When the water in the skin was gone, she cast the child under one of the bushes. 16 Then she went and sat down opposite him a good way off, about the distance of a bowshot; for she said, "Do not let me look on the death of the child." And as she sat opposite him, she lifted up her voice and wept. 17 And God heard the voice of the boy; and the angel of God called to Hagar from heaven, and said to her, "What troubles you, Hagar? Do not be afraid; for God has heard the voice of the boy where he is. 18 Come, lift up the boy and hold him fast with your hand, for I will make a great nation of him." 19 Then God opened her eyes and she saw a well of water. She went, and filled the skin with water, and gave the boy a drink. 20 God was with the boy, and he grew up; he lived in the wilderness and became an expert with the bow. 21 He lived in the wilderness of Paran; and his mother got a wife for him from the land of Egypt. Amen.

With Hagar and Ishmael's story on our hearts, we turn to our second Scripture reading, Matthew 10: 26-31, 37-39. Jesus, the One who embodied the character of the God "who hears Ishmael," speaks honestly about what to expect (coming persecutions) and what is expected. The faithfulness expected is rooted in the faithfulness of God who watches over each child, even as "God's eye is on the sparrow." Jesus' teaching on loyalty to God above one's family is better understood in light of the Genesis story. Sarah's fierce loyalty to her son caused her to become an oppressor of God's "other son." A human tragedy that is still relevant today when we value our own over all God's children. Hear now a reading from Holy Scripture.

26 "So have no fear of them (of those who persecute you); for nothing is covered up that will not be uncovered, and nothing secret that will not become known. 27 What I say to you in the dark, tell in the light; and what you hear whispered, proclaim from the housetops. 28 Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul; rather fear the One who can destroy both soul and body in hell. 29 Are not two sparrows sold for a penny? Yet not one of them will fall to the ground apart from your Father. 30 And even the hairs of your head are all counted. 31 So do not be afraid; you are of more value than many sparrows.....37 Whoever loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and whoever loves son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me; 38 and whoever does not take up the cross and follow me is not worthy of me. 39 Those who find their life will lose it, and those who lose their life for my sake will find it. Amen.

The title of the sermon: Children of Abraham

The text: “And God heard the voice of the boy...” Genesis 21:17a

Let us pray: God of Compassion, when we feel abandoned, help us to remember your faithfulness to Ishmael; and as we seek to be faithful, give us the wideness of your mercy. Amen.

Call me Ishmael. With these three words Herman Melville begins his nineteenth century novel Moby Dick and introduces the man who will be telling his story of the adventures at sea. For Melville, naming his narrator after the biblical character Ishmael who was sent forth into the wilderness has multiple meanings. Both “Ishmaels” find themselves alone in a wilderness of sorts, both discovery water as the source of life, and both struggle as outsiders of the religious orthodoxy of their day.

The Ishmael in Melville’s Moby Dick is an inlander of Massachusetts. Ishmael believes he will find the source of life, peace, and things “everlastingly remote” at sea. What follows is the story of Pequod’s voyage and a complete picture of the nineteenth century whaling industry.

However, on another level, Melville has recreated the society of American culture within this community of whalers. Moby Dick, when understood as a parable, reveals the painful truth about mid-nineteenth century America, which promised human equality but advocated slavery, racial exploitation, and exclusion of women. Within the novel, Melville reverses the social order of the whaler society implying equality of all humanity and exposing the hypocrisy and oppression within the white, Christian, American culture.

The sermon Ishmael hears before going to sea offers a key to the entire novel. Ishmael understands the pulpit as the prow of a ship, the world as the ship, and the Holy Bible as the bow ready to bear the brunt of all evil.

Father Mapple, a former harpooner, preaches on the story of Jonah and the whale reminding his parishioners: “If we obey God, we must disobey ourselves; and it is in this disobeying ourselves, wherein the hardness of obeying God consists.” (Chapter VIII, IX)

Melville believed that the human tendency was to approach life with a single purpose in mind “my way,” whereas God recognizes multiple purposes.

In Moby Dick, the downfall of the captain of the ship, Ahab, was his sole purpose of asserting his nature above all others in seeking to destroy the “evil” whale. Ultimately, this caused his own downfall, taking his ship and crew with him.

At one point, Ishmael proclaims: “...Heaven have mercy on us all—Presbyterians and Pagans alike—for we are all somehow dreadfully cracked about the head, and sadly in need of mending.” (Chapter XVII)

The biblical story of Ishmael is a poignant reminder that we are all in need of mending. Time and time again we see in religious people, even in ourselves, what Sarah demonstrates in this Genesis story. In fact, in this narrative Sarah symbolizes the established people of God.

As one who has been transformed through an experience of grace, Sarah knew the barrenness of the wilderness in the pain of her own infertility. Now by the grace of God, she holds the gift of life in her arms. Within three verses in the biblical narrative her gratitude for this gift of life turns into greed on behalf of the life she has been given as she and Abraham drive Hagar and Ishmael into the wilderness to die.

This story highlights how quickly we come to understand God's gifts of grace as legal rights of the chosen. This is a story of God's people failing to internalize God's grace and becoming at odds with God's purposes. This is a story of God's grace reaching out in spite of God's people.

Ishmael means "God hears." The story of Ishmael affirms that God hears even the outsider who is abandoned by the tradition. These are the stories of faith that teach us the most about the character of God. As the biblical narrative unfolds in the story of the chosen Isaac, Ishmael reminds us that even "the other children" are treasured by God. Ishmael's story continues in the Quran, and he becomes an important patriarch for our Islamic brothers and sisters, who are also children of the God of Abraham.

One of the great joys of my ministry at Westminster has been the Children of Abraham interfaith fellowship which began the fall of 2016. An Adult Education Forum Westminster hosted in January of that year was the impetus for this initiative. We invited Rabbi Marks from the Jewish community and Dr. Mostoufi from the Islamic community to join me in an interfaith dialogue reflecting on a book of essays entitled The Tent of Abraham, Stories of Hope and Peace for Jews, Christians, and Muslims. We welcomed over 100 people from the community in Parish Hall as we highlighted each faith tradition's connection to Abraham. The Jewish community through Isaac, the Islamic community through Ishmael, and the Christian community through Jesus Christ, whose genealogy is traced to King David. Today, through Children of Abraham's quarterly gatherings, we teach love and mutual respect and in so doing fulfill the words of Abraham Lincoln: "Teach the children so it will not be necessary to teach the adults."

Although we are not there yet, we are grateful for how far we have come on our faith journey since these ancient of days...for the spirit which blew through the testaments of Holy Scripture in surprising and unexpected ways, making a place at the table for the outsider. As a congregation with roots in the abolitionist movement and the Underground Railroad, we have been a voice crying out in the wilderness for justice and equality since our beginnings. That cry continues this very day as our youth mission team visits The Legacy Museum and Memorial for Peace and Justice in Montgomery, Alabama before they begin their work tomorrow in Selma, rebuilding homes devastated by tornados earlier this year.

Presbyterians, according to Melville, need mending, and we continue to mend on our march toward justice, reformed and always reforming.

May we never forget that at the heart of what it means to be a disciple of Jesus Christ is listening to "the Ishmaels" in our world and responding with the wideness of God's mercy.

Are not two sparrows sold for a penny? Yet not one of them will fall to the ground apart from your Father. Matthew 10:29

Thanks be to God. Amen.
